SPEEDY GONZALES

GO SPEEDY GO!

"Arriba! Arriba! Andale! Andale! Eh-hah!"

Whenever you hear that famous getaway line, you know that Speedy Gonzales is about to whoosh off into the distance. And even though the "fastest mouse in all of Mexico" (as Speedy modestly describes himself) has been around for 41 years, he hasn't slowed down one bit!

A SPEEDY DEBUT

It was 1953 when Speedy made his first appearance in the Warner Bros. cartoon "Cat-Tails for Two." In that movie, Speedy looked quite a bit different — browner, scrawnier, and, well, much rattier-looking than the mouse we know and love today. His sombrero was missing, and he had lots of raggedy teeth — including one big gold tooth. Of course, he was the fastest mouse around, and in the cartoon he managed to outwit two hungry cats by constantly outrunning them. That set the style that has lasted 41 years.

It took two years for the quick-footed mouse to make another movie appearance, when he was brought back to star in a cartoon called (what else?) Speedy Gonzales. The Warner Bros. artists had redesigned Speedy then so he appeared as now — boyishly handsome, bright-eyed and topped by an enormous sombrero. Speedy's co-star was that "bad ol' puddy tat" Sylvester, who played the guard at a Mexican cheese factory. In this cartoon, a group of mice plot to invade the factory, drawing straws to choose who will try to get past the hungry cat. But when Sylvester catches the loser, Manuel, the other mice send for the heroic Speedy. With high spirits and rocketlike energy, Speedy defeats Sylvester and saves the day. At one point, the poor cat gets caught in the dozens of mousetraps he himself had earlier set! Later on, Speedy runs full speed into Sylvester's mouth only to race right through and pop out his tail! Finally, Sylvester blows up the factory to keep Speedy and his pals from getting in -- and the cheese rains down on the happy mice!

THERE'S NO STOPPING SPEEDY

Speedy Gonzales received the Academy Award for the Best Animated Cartoon of 1955. The supersonic mouse grabbed two more Academy Award nominations for Tabasco Road (1957) and The Pied Piper of Guadalupe (1961). Although Sylvester already had a full-time job chasing Tweety, the luckless cat often ended up as Speedy's opponent. Whether Sylvester was playing an "alley gato" (alley cat) or a cheese factory guard, he never could catch Speedy. In Gonzales Tamales, Speedy even threatens Sylvester, saying, "Gringo Pussycat -- eef I see you, I weel pool your tail out by eets root!" And guess what. That's exactly what Speedy did!

Over the next four decades, Speedy scampered through comic books and cartoons with such co-stars as Sylvester, Daffy Duck, the Two Crows, and Speedy's cousin, Slowpoke Rodriguez, who just happens to be the world's slowest mouse.

A MODERN MOUSE

But was Speedy content to appear in movies and comics alone? No way! Speedy has moved into the world of video games. A company called Sunsoft of America has developed a game called (what else?) Speedy Gonzales. The object of the game is for our hero to rescue his mouse-napped friends from the evil King Rat. The game features Speedy racing through each of four levels in an attempt to collect as much cheese as possible. Speedy pays King Rat's ransom in cheese to free his friends. In the game, Speedy is asked to outmaneuver collapsing scenery, fans and spikes -- not to mention cats and mouse-traps.

What's next for Speedy? One thing's for sure. His speed and spunky nature, combined with his total disregard for danger, makes Speedy a total winner. And sorry to break the news to you, Sylvester, but there hasn't been a cat born yet who can outwit our hero.

Viva Speedy!

THE LAST LAUGH!
